

Rel around fake paintings Altink finally over

AMSTERDAM, Wednesday.

Justice has dismissed the lawsuit against a painter from Beilen. Cor van L [REDACTED] was suspected that he had forged paintings by painter Altink. Altink (1885-1971) belonged to the Groningen Ploeg, a group of expressionist painters.

In March 1993 the prosecutor dismissed the case also for lack of evidence. But a new study in the set following a complaint wore the Amsterdam Court the Public Prosecutor (OM). Mr. Drs. E. Schonfeld, the lawyer of the painter expects Altink affair now definitely ended. He is a modest claim damages for his client. The Amsterdam District Court awarded the Drent to two years ago a compensation of nearly 10,000 florins. The alleged forgery was four years ago to light, when Christie's and Sotheby's in Amsterdam just before auction withdrew some of Altink paintings. The canvases, introduced by Van L [REDACTED], would be false. Sotheby's did to the police report of attempted fraud. Rival Christie's saw off, but acknowledged that the paintings would be auctioned were not real. Paint Types.

That was not the investigation of the Forensic Laboratory in Rijswijk. It concluded on the basis of the paints used that was not clear true or false at work. The court instructed the prosecution last year on a new study in the set following a complaint from a gallery owner from Heiloo. She was not satisfied with the decision of Justice because it would damage its reputation. The art dealer at the time had spread the rumor according to Schonfeld that it would be a falsification.

A sworn art broker has been valued conscious paintings. Auke van der Werff, including old auctioneer Sotheby's, the eight paintings of outstanding quality. The work has been sold to renowned collectors.
